

Network Security Review Questions and Answers

10. What are intrusion detection systems (IDS) and intrusion prevention systems (IPS)?

An Intrusion Detection System (IDS) monitors network traffic for suspicious activities or policy violations and alerts administrators when such activities occur. It is passive and does not block traffic. An Intrusion Prevention System (IPS) not only detects but also takes actions to prevent or block potentially harmful traffic in real-time.

11. Compare them and give examples of how each might be deployed in a network.

An IDS is deployed out-of-band, meaning it only monitors traffic through a network tap or span port, while an IPS is inline and can block malicious traffic. Example- IDS may be used in a data center to monitor network logs, while IPS may be used at the network perimeter to block attacks before they enter.

12. Explain what Multi-Factor Authentication (MFA) is, why it is important for network security, and describe how you would implement it in an organisation migrating to cloud services.

MFA requires users to provide two or more verification factors—something they know (password), something they have (security token), or something they are (biometric). It enhances security by reducing the risk of unauthorized access even if passwords are compromised. To implement MFA in a cloud migration, integrate MFA with identity providers like Azure AD, Google Workspace, or Okta to secure logins across cloud apps.

13. Describe the concept of segmentation in network security (for example using VLANs or sub-nets).

Segmentation divides a network into smaller parts (segments) to limit access and reduce the spread of attacks. This can be achieved using VLANs or subnets. For example, HR systems can be separated from guest Wi-Fi through VLANs, ensuring that sensitive data is protected.

14. Explain its advantages and how you would design segmentation in a small to medium enterprise environment.

Advantages of segmentation include improved security, reduced attack surface, better performance, and easier management. In a small to medium enterprise, segmentation can be implemented by grouping similar devices or departments into VLANs (e.g., Finance VLAN, Guest VLAN, Admin VLAN) and enforcing access controls using firewalls or ACLs between them.
