

Bean Lab Report

Hypothesis:

If the environmental light pollution intensifies, then light red walking beans will become harder to see. When this happens, dark red walking beans will become easier for predators to spot, marking a decline in their population. Once the red light pollution reduces, the population of dark red walking beans and light red walking beans will return to normal.

The purpose of this lab is to observe how environmental changes can affect living organisms.

Summary of Procedure:

First, the beans are collected at random. Then, the viewfinders are used to simulate the red light pollution. Again the beans are collected at random, but now the light red beans are harder to see. Dark red beans are more visible, so the chances are higher that a random bean selected by a predator will be dark red. This leads to a decline in the dark red beans and an increase in the light red bean population. Once the red light simulators are no longer used, both phenotypes of beans will be visible, causing the distribution of traits to be regulated.

Scenario

You are a zocco sent to Planet Oopsa by NASA. You need to eat a species of walking bean, which has two different phenotypes: light red and dark red. On day 4 of your mission, a volcano named Mount Kaboom erupts, creating red light pollution in the atmosphere. When this happens, light red beans are harder to see than dark red beans. Predators, such as the zocco in this scenario, find it is easier to spot dark red beans in the midst of the pollution. Thus, the population of dark red beans declines rapidly. But, on day 7 of the mission, the pollution clears, and both types of beans are visible. The populations of both types of beans returns to normal.
