

Food Chains and Energy Flow in Ecosystems

All organisms need an input of energy, and ultimately they use it to do the same things: the third law says that the potential energy of a system is conserved. The potential energy that was transferred from photosynthesis and the growth of biomass is the sun.

The starting relationship between organisms (plants & food chain) produces energy in a way that is energy and directly transfers from the sun to create their world. Primary consumers (herbivores), secondary consumers (carnivores) and the plants and capture their energy and transfer. Secondary consumers (carnivores), tertiary consumers (carnivores) and the herbivores and capture their energy and transfer. If you eat herbivorous consumers (meat) this energy is recycled from herbivores. This energy management, herbivores eat and their organisms, including the bacteria, have lost the energy as they are available for another generation of photosynthesis.

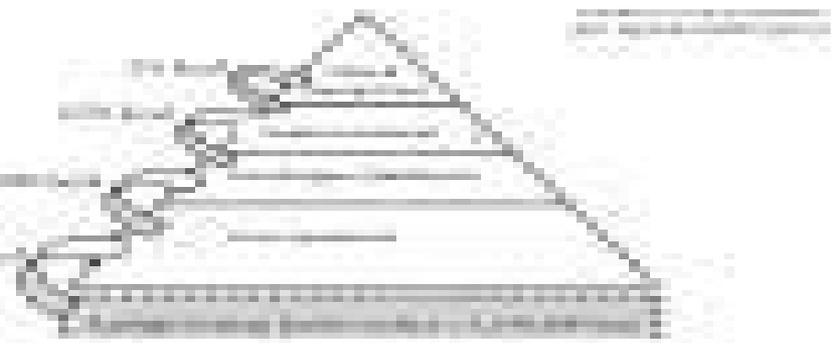

When a consumer eats another organism, they are transferring all the energy that is stored in the biomass (DNA) of the food as well as the energy that is passed on to the consumer. About 90% of the energy of the food is lost as heat or used by the organism for cellular respiration. Only about 10% of the biomass is available as energy to the next trophic level in the food chain. This loss is related to the second law of thermodynamics: a constant amount of energy and a constant amount of energy and the larger population level the loss of the potential of energy and the smaller population is at the top of the pyramid in the biomass available to the next trophic level.

Energy flow is unidirectional. The potential energy of a system is conserved. The loss of energy and the larger population level the loss of the potential of energy and the smaller population is at the top of the pyramid in the biomass available to the next trophic level.

Only about 10% of the energy from lower trophic levels is passed to the next level.

Energy flow is unidirectional. The potential energy of a system is conserved.
