Food is the subject of various types of tourism product and is a common theme in marketing, by businesses and destination authorities. Tourism in which food plays a primary or supporting role is already popular and has good prospects, but there are also challenges for the food and tourism industries to overcome, which vary with location.

Practical implications – Opportunities are suggested as well as some of the problems to be resolved by suppliers and marketers if the potential of food tourism is to be fully exploited. Originality/value – The paper is a reassessment of the significance of food tourism as a product and market and a reminder of possible pitfalls regarding its successful sales and marketing. The focus does, however, tend to be on conditions in destinations and markets of western developed states. There is perhaps a continuum of commitment amongst tourists (Enteleca Research and Consultancy, 2000) and organised activities like sampling, and learning about food, are undertaken by those with a more serious, and special interest. Such food-based tourism has been variously labelled culinary tourism (Wolf, 2002), gastronomy tourism (Hjalanger and Richards, 2002) and tasting tourism (Boniface, 2003) in addition to food tourism (Hall et al. 2003).
