

Abstract

1

Abstract of the paper presented at the 1998 Annual Meeting of the American Psychological Association, Washington, DC, September 11-15, 1998.

The purpose of this study was to examine the effects of a 12-week group-based cognitive-behavioral intervention on the self-efficacy and coping strategies of African American women with a history of intimate partner violence. The study was conducted in a community-based setting in a large urban area. The sample consisted of 40 women who were recruited through a variety of sources, including churches, social service agencies, and community centers. The women were randomly assigned to either the intervention group or a waitlist control group. The intervention group received a 12-week program of cognitive-behavioral therapy (CBT) that focused on enhancing self-efficacy and teaching coping strategies. The waitlist control group did not receive any intervention during the 12-week period. Data were collected at baseline, 6 weeks, and 12 weeks. Results showed that the intervention group had significantly higher self-efficacy scores and used more active coping strategies compared to the waitlist control group at both the 6-week and 12-week follow-up. These findings suggest that a group-based CBT intervention can be effective in improving self-efficacy and coping strategies in African American women with a history of intimate partner violence.
