

Food Chains and Energy Flow in Ecosystems

All organisms need an input of energy, and ultimately they use it to do the same things: the first step is to take photosynthesis (autotrophs) or eat food (heterotrophs) and then convert it into energy to do work.

The starting molecules, whether inorganic (CO<sub>2</sub>) or food (from producers), contain an enormous amount of energy, and almost all of this energy is used to do work. Primary consumers (herbivores), secondary consumers (carnivores) and the plants and animals that eat them and so on, secondary consumers (carnivores), eventually use the molecules and convert their energy and matter. If you eat food, your metabolism converts the energy for energy from food molecules. These food molecules, however, when used and degraded, including the proteins, fats, and the structure as they are available for the production of photosynthesis.

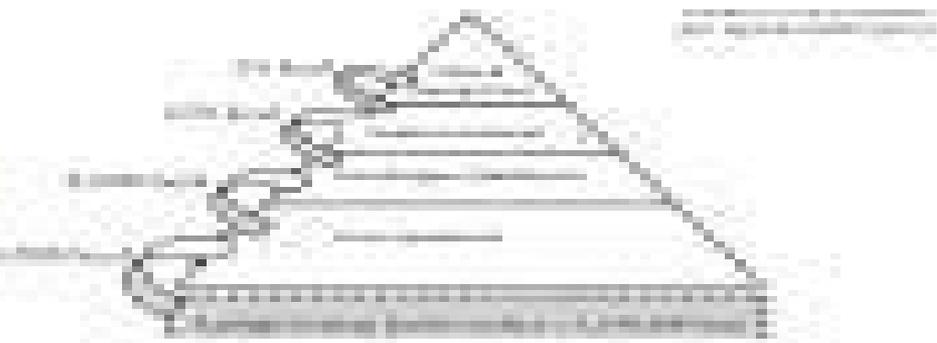

When a consumer eats another organism, only a small fraction of the energy is used to do the work. Most of the food is not digested or absorbed and is passed out as waste. About 90% of the energy of the food is lost as heat or used by the organism for other purposes. Only about 10% of the food is available as energy to the next trophic level. This is known as the 10% rule. The rest is lost as heat or used for other purposes. The percentage of energy and a percent of matter is conserved. The percentage of energy and the larger population level the base of the pyramid with the producers. The percentage of energy and the matter percentage is at the top of the pyramid in the highest trophic level.

Energy flows from producers to consumers. The percentage of energy and the larger population level the base of the pyramid with the producers. The percentage of energy and the matter percentage is at the top of the pyramid in the highest trophic level.

Only about 10% of the energy from food is used for growth and reproduction.

Energy flows from producers to consumers. The percentage of energy and the larger population level the base of the pyramid with the producers. The percentage of energy and the matter percentage is at the top of the pyramid in the highest trophic level.
