components. Since the pressure is electronic, it can not be considered inaccurate, practically without delay.

Feeding

Special wiring equipment is required for checking out the various components of the system in case of trouble. A detailed description of the complete wiring procedure will be given later.

BASIC FUEL QUANTITY

The basic fuel quantity requirement is determined by engine speed (rpm), and engine load. It is logical that when the engine has to develop a lot of power and runs fast, it needs more fuel.

The information on engine load is given by the pressure sensor, and engine speed is indicated by the distributor trigger circuit as mentioned before.

PRESSURE SENSOR

The essential pressure sensor is connected to the left of the engine. A sectional view is shown. It is connected to the intake air distribution by a thin tube line. It consists of a hermetic type sensor which according to the prevailing pressure in the manifold causes a cylindrical membrane to a tiny hole hole. The subsequent variation of the air pressure in the primary and secondary windings of the transformer are fed into the control unit. The flow becomes one of the pressure sensor according to the length of the electric pulse to the system.

When an exact or essential pressure, it should be understood that this is the absolute pressure in the manifold which actually is a depression or partial vacuum. Inasmuch as the VW engine is supercharged, manifold pressure may be below atmospheric pressure.

Sectional view of pressure sensor. The pressure sensor is adapted to measure manifold pressure. Pressure variations are converted into electrical impulses. These impulses are fed into the electronic control unit.

The essential pressure sensor is connected to the left of the engine.

NEW TYPE PRESSURE SENSOR

A new type pressure sensor is used for the latest models. A sectional view is shown on page 52.

The attention is directed to test fuel systems and engine components for all practical purposes can be considered trustworthy.
