

1. Why does the Kaiser say he "just has no meaningful choice as the nation's employer"?

The Kaiser says he has no choice because "because the demand is building", and because he "wishes to do the responsible thing, namely, to be certain that every one of the 100,000 steel employees would be employed in some way that is an orderly, planned-out continuation of our normal steel activities, that is, that he has no choice."

However, the Kaiser, as the employer, is not bound by the same rules that govern steel companies. He can, if he chooses, provide health care for his employees, or he can choose to stop it. He can also choose to pay his employees less than he would have to if he were not the employer.

2. How does the Kaiser say a community could encourage workers to return to the workplace, if that option is available, after the Spring has gone? What are the pros and cons of this option?

The Kaiser says that a community could encourage workers to return to the workplace if the Spring has gone by "encouraging workers to return to the workplace, and by providing some other means of encouraging workers to return to the workplace." He says that the Kaiser is "not sure" that a community could encourage workers to return to the workplace, but he says that the Kaiser is "not sure" that a community could encourage workers to return to the workplace.
