Background

The United States is said to have reached a stage where the status of health care is precarious, primarily because it is simply not sustainable anymore in an environment where there are just under 50 million US citizens uninsured, out of which Massachusetts alone accounts for a figure of about half million such cases. There are many business units, mostly the small ones, which are forced to drop out of the health care safety net because they cannot afford the costs. The yearly rise of insurance premiums and the lack of clarity on product availability and suitable product mix also prevent many first-time insurance buyers from buying into health care benefits. These include part-time workers and many who work at different jobs. This situation is completely unjust and reforms are needed in this context to rectify it. (McDonough, 2000)

So, when the State of Massachusetts voted in a bill making it mandatory for citizens to buy insurance cover, it was only recognizing the fact that insurance reforms are a conduit for health care benefits at affordable prices and a well-insured population also helps to bring costs down. Governor Mitt Romney ensured that over 500 million people in his state would be insured through the first-ever law-stipulating individuals should obtain health care benefits.
