

How A Cell Phone Call Works

The Basics

Cell phones are radio devices — they communicate by transmitting and receiving voice over an area.

First a cell phone radios the nearest cell tower (or site). When you make a call or turn your phone on, your phone sends a message via radio that's picked up by the tower's antennas.

Next, a wire or fiberoptic line carries the call down to the wireless access point, connected to a multi-port switch.

The call (along with many others) gets routed to a backhaul — usually down to an underground wired T1 or T3 line, but sometimes back up the mast to a powerful line-of-sight wireless microwave antenna (typically only used either when there isn't a ground connection, or when the ground connection is poor).

The incoming call or data comes back from the backhaul and up through the switch to the antenna, where it then hits your phone (presuming your phone is still communicating with the same site). If you are moving, then there's a handoff—a new but more or less identical cell site transmits the data to your phone, once your phone checks in.
