this purpose we rely on MTTF and MTTR MTTF is quantified by the reliability function in a component and its value should be modified based on pre defined scenarios which indicate average maintenance interval AMI types Then the existing components with a different maintenance times are sorted according to the maintenance effect on keeping the availability of the system while reducing the maintenance cost The sorting list is divided into two groups top loop components with low maintenance effect and bottom loop components with high maintenance effect After running the KSA decision process the outcomes consist of different 2STEP NO3 with different combinations of maintenance scenarios in the existing components in the DHW system The main criterion in selection of the 2STEP NO3 is to have the modified availability system with maintenance plan equal to or greater than the current system availability system without maintenance plan In the next step we examine changing the arrangement of the heat transfer sub system from parallel to standby in order to reduce maintenance cost while keeping the availability of the system at the same level In addition a replacement analysis is performed on the heat exchanger to identify the replacement time in its repairable subcomponents Finally a life cycle cost LCC analysis is performed to compare the maintenance cost and replacement cost between these two options HVAC
