

How Do Bees Make Honey?

By Mary Culler

Have you ever wondered how something as small as a bee could make something with such big flavor? Bees create honey through a complicated process. There are several factors involved in honey creation. The first is the bee's diet. The second factor is what occurs inside the bee itself. Finally, the beehive plays an important part. Let's look at how honey making starts.

Honey actually begins with flowers. A flower contains nectar. As bees fly from flower to flower for the purposes of pollination, they feed on the nectar from flowers. Depending on what flowers the bee visits, the honey will have different properties of taste and color. However, before we get to the honey, we have to discover what happens to the nectar in the bee's body.

Once the bee eats the nectar, it starts to transform. Natural chemicals in the bee's body turn nectar into different types of sugar, fructose and sucrose. The bee's body also turns some of the sugars into acids which kill bacteria. At this point, nectar is a sweet, watery mix, but it is far from honey. The honey is actually developed in the hive.

Beehives are not just places for bees to rest at night. The beehive contains many little cells, or holes. As the bee creates the watery mix of nectar and sugar, it deposits it into the holes in the hive. The mix is still runny, and not what we think of as the thick, syrupy honey. In order to thicken the mixture, bees fan the deposits with their wings. Soon the hive is full of a thick, sweet liquid- honey. To prevent it all from slowly escaping, bees seal this honeycomb with beeswax. Honey can then be harvested by human beekeepers.

Honey is delicious, but it takes a lot of work from many bees to create. Flowers must be visited in order to collect nectar. Biological processes inside the bee have to turn the nectar into purified sugars. The nectar mixture has to be thickened and preserved in the hive. The next time you are about to enjoy a mouthful of delicious golden honey, think about all the hard work that went into it!
