

Field trips and field reports

Field trips and reports are very variable in purpose and format, but will often be about the spatial relationships among data (eg archaeology, geology, geography, soil science, forestry, vegetation studies). However, field reports in anthropology, social geography and ecology may not be primarily about spatial data, although the physical setting will still usually be important. Time relationships, such as geological processes or cultural history, may also be important.

Preparation

Clarify the purpose of the field trip and subsequent report with your lecturer, and read any handouts and preliminary articles or textbook chapters before the actual trip. This helps to alert you to major theoretical frameworks, or important observations before you go. You will find it very hard to write a good report if you omitted to collect critical data in the field, so waiting to think about the aims, types of observations and possible implications till after the trip is too late. If it is to be a group report, try to organise your group beforehand so as to plan efficient data collection in the field. For example, one person to take photographs, one to make sketch maps, two to take notes from talks, etc.

Identifying the main issue

Ask yourself what the lecturer setting the course hopes that you will get out of the field trip. What major theories, methodology, techniques, and/or practical knowledge are being tested or illustrated? Your report should relate your field observations to the main issues dealt with in the course as a whole. If you are required to focus on only one aspect of the course in your final report, although many are covered in the trip, try to identify two or three possible focuses before you go, so you can predict what kind of information you should be collecting, and do some pre-reading on those areas.

Taking notes in the field

This can be difficult, so make sure that you have a clipboard; lots of paper (some sheets partly formatted beforehand if you know the kind of data you have to collect); some 3mm square graph paper to help sketching, graphing or mapping; multiple pens and pencils, including coloured pencils; rubber; sharpener; folder for completed sheets; and plastic bag to put papers in if it is raining. You may find a camera and colour film very useful, but remember to include a lens cap or person in the photo to indicate the scale, and write corresponding notes on what you photographed, where it was and why it was important. Apart from taking photos or making measurements, focus on looking and listening, and add to notes between stops, or collaborate with a friend to make sure you get all the information. Record place names, time and date, and names and titles (job positions) of speakers (all accurately spelt). Use labelled sketches and plans to record spatial and visual information, noting proportions and approximate sizes of structures or map scales alongside. Remember to label tables with column and row headings and graphs with axes.
