

Flower Dissection: Studying the Anatomy of Angiosperms

Introduction:

The angiosperms are seed-bearing plants that produce flowers. Similar to gymnosperms, they have seeds, which contain the plant embryo, are produced in the flower. However, gymnosperms bear their seeds in cones, rather than flowers.

Flower structures can be divided into two groups: essential organs and the accessory organs. The essential organs are the reproductive structures, which include the stamens (male) and the pistils (female). The accessory organs are the sepals and petals, which surround and protect the essential organs.

Male Organs:

The stamen is the male reproductive organ and consists of two parts: the anther and the filament. The anther is the enlarged structure at the top of the stamen. Inside the anther are pollen sacs. The pollen sacs contain pollen grains which each contain two sperm nuclei. When the pollen grains mature, the pollen sacs split open to release the dust-like pollen. The filament is the thin stalk that supports the anther.

Female Organs:

The pistil is the female reproductive organ and consists of three parts: the stigma, the style, and the ovary. The stigma is an enlarged portion at the top of the pistil that becomes moist and sticky when mature. The style is the middle portion of the pistil. It can be long and slender, short, or even absent depending on the species. The ovary is the enlarged structure at the bottom of the pistil. The ovary contains one or more hollow compartments called locules. Each locule contains one or more ovules. Special cells within the ovule undergo meiosis to form eggs.
