Predator-Prey Relations and Invasive Species Virtual Lab

Ecology

In an ecosystem, different species interact with each other and can have positive, negative, or neutral interactions with each other. Predation is an interaction between two organisms where the predator consumes the prey, both of which are usually heterotrophic or organisms that cannot produce their own food and rely on obtaining nutrition from other sources such as plants or other organisms. When the prey organism is a plant, this is referred to as herbivory. Predators differ from decomposers because predators get their energy from organisms that are either living or recently killed while decomposers break down into or remain of organisms that have died.

Population Dynamics of Predators and Prey

A population is the number of organisms of a same species that live in the same area at the same time. The population size of predators and prey in a community are usually constantly changing as to prey less resources become available. Usually, when the population of predators increases, they are able to hunt more prey thus reducing the population size of the prey. With a decreased food source for the predators, some will starve and die off, reducing the population size of the predators. After the predator population decreases, there will be less threat to the prey, which allows the prey population to increase, which will ultimately replenish the food source for the predator population. This pattern usually continues throughout the year where there is no constant carrying capacity for the ecosystem.

Predators, however, are not the only factor that control the prey population. If the prey is an herbivore, then the amount of plant growth in the area also has an effect on the prey population. For example, if a wildfire burns away most of the plant growth the food supply for the prey will be reduced causing a reduction in the prey population size. With less prey available, the predator population will also decrease.

Adaptations/Defense Mechanisms

Organisms have certain traits/characteristics that allow them to survive and thrive in their environment more than others. These traits are called adaptations. Predator and prey interactions are usually a driving force for some of these adaptations. Predators need to be able to find and catch their prey while prey need to avoid
