

HUMAN GEOGRAPHY

POPULATION

Human geography studies the physical world, how it affects the way we live and how we live in different places. The study of population is called demography.

POPULATION GROWTH

Demographers describe trends and changes related to population.

The total fertility rate (TFR) is the number of babies that each woman has on average.

The replacement level is the number of children each woman must have to replace herself. This is about 2.1 children.

Demographers describe the age structure of a population. They use population pyramids to show the number of people in different age groups.

Population growth is a measure of how many people there are in a country. It is the number of people added to a country's population. This is the sum of immigrants and births minus deaths and emigrants.

A population pyramid shows the number of people in different age groups. It is a bar chart with age groups on the x-axis and population on the y-axis. The pyramid is wider at the bottom (younger ages) and narrower at the top (older ages).
