

An advantage of steam cooking is that food is not mixed or shaken; for example, eggs can be placed in the oven in their paper container or set on a tray - cooking is even and thorough (even large quantities), while the shells are kept perfectly unbroken.

Steam and vacuum-packed food: 70/90 °C and needle probe.

The AC Series can also be used to cook vacuum-pack products. This increasingly popular method virtually eliminates food weight loss, reduces the need for seasoning and lengthens the life of cooked dishes (if chilled and stored at -3 °C, even for 20/25 days). In this way you can extend your catering menu on an almost exponential scale. The exclusive AC Series needle probe used for vacuum cooking can also be used outside the oven for measuring the temperature of plates and dishes.

- Exclusive needle probe.
- Retains nutritional value of foods.
- Less seasoning and salt needed.
- Simultaneous cooking of different dishes.
- Rapidly cooks large quantities of food.

Forced: 130 °C

Forced steam is used in the initial cooking stages of deep-frozen foods (e.g. vegetables) or fresh skinned produce (e.g. potatoes, turnips, beets). By using steam heated to 130 °C, the temperature difference between the product and the oven is reduced, especially important when large quantities of food are to be cooked.
