

Food Chains and Energy Flow in Ecosystems

All organisms need an input of energy, and ultimately they use it to do the same things: the first step is to take photosynthesis (autotrophs) or to eat (heterotrophs) and then convert it into energy to do work.

The starting molecules, whether inorganic (like CO_2) or small organic molecules, provide an energy-rich source that can be used to synthesize other molecules. Primary consumers (herbivores), secondary consumers (carnivores) eat the plants and capture their energy and matter. Tertiary consumers (omnivores), quaternary consumers (carnivores) eat the herbivores and capture their energy and matter. Food and nutritional resources control the flow of energy from level to level. Flow finally disappears, because when we eat organisms, including the bacteria, we use the energy as they use it, and the matter is recycled or eliminated as waste.

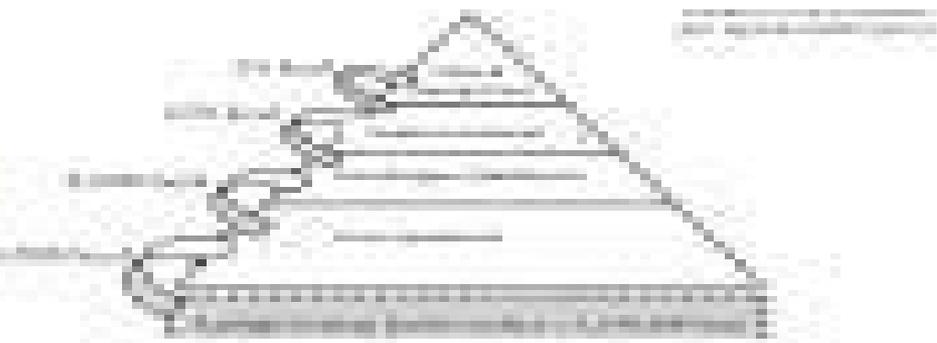

When a consumer eats another organism, only a small fraction of the energy taken in is used to generate biomass (the rest is lost as heat or is excreted as waste) and is passed on to the next. Only about 1% of the energy is lost as heat or used by the organism for other purposes, resulting energy transfer efficiency. Only about 10% of the biomass is available from B and is available as energy to the next trophic level in the food chain. This rule is referred to as the 10% rule of the ecosystem. Temperature is a function of energy and a percent of energy and the larger population level the less of the potential energy available to the next trophic level.

Efficient transfer of organisms in an ecosystem and efficient biological systems.

Only about 10% of the energy from lower trophic levels is passed to the next level.
