

Great hook to lead into report

Thunderstorms can be quite scary, but they are also an amazing meteorological phenomenon to explore

A thunderstorm consists of two parts, the lightning strike and the loud clap of thunder afterwards. We are going to break down each individual part to see just what happens and why.

How does a thunderstorm form? As warm moist clouds swiftly rise from the lower atmosphere it causes the vapor in the clouds to condense into water and even ice in some instances. All this new water and ice form together to make the towering cumulonimbus clouds we commonly see as the big dark clouds before a storm. Consequently the hot air displaces the cold air and pushes it down in a big rush which we feel as wind.

A thunderstorm can't occur without bright lighting. With all this action happening in the clouds tiny particles are gradually building an electric charge from being rubbed together. Once the charge is great enough the energy must go somewhere resulting in a discharge. Put simply this means the electrical charge is trying to escape and dissipate into something else. It does this by looking for the closest thing it can go to and of course there is no where it can go in the clouds, so it goes to the ground. We see this as big purple or blue strikes spanning across the clouds or hitting the ground known as lightning. Whilst this looks impressive it is quite dangerous producing anywhere up to around one billion volts, remembering that 3,000 - 1,000 volts can easily kill someone.

The other half of the phenomenon is thunder, when the lightning strikes its heats the air around it to three times the sun's heat, consequently the hot air rises swiftly causing air pockets in the sky which are then filled by this heat. There are many variables which decide how loud and when you hear the thunder. If it is a big strike you will hear it quite loud and quickly, whereas a smaller strike it will be much quieter. Another major factor is just how far away from the strike you are. Sound travels at around 1230kms per hour and the shockwave can only be heard roughly 2-kms away. It also quietens as it moves further away from the source as it is a longitudinal sound wave. So putting all these factors into place this should help you understand just how thunder works.

Hopefully after diving deeper into the science behind a thunderstorm next time the phenomenon happens you can sit back and enjoy knowing exactly how it occurs.
