

ESSAY 3

To what extent are migrants a threat to today's world?

One of the worst things a migrant can hear is "Go home!". Indeed, for someone who has travelled a long way from his hometown, who has made a big sacrifice to leave everything behind and step out of his comfort zone to work in a foreign country to earn himself a livelihood, it would inadvertently be heartbreaking to face an unwelcoming local population. However, this is unfortunately very much the reality in today's globalised and competitive world as many see migrants as a threat to the country as they seemingly bring more potential harm than benefits. However, detractors may argue that this is not necessarily the case and migrants do actually bring significant economic and cultural benefits to the country which they migrate to. Personally, I believe that although it is true that migrant can bring about benefits for the country, they still have the potential to threaten it, disrupting the social fabric and posing security dangers to the society. Hence, it is justifiable to say that migrants are a threat to a country in today's world.

Those who are very welcoming of migrants are those who see the economic benefits that migrants, usually migrant workers, bring. Migrant workers often take up jobs that are shunned away by many educated locals. For example, it is common to see that migrants from the Phillipines travel all over the world to work in the customer service sector while migrants from India and Bangladesh find jobs in the construction job sector. They offer a cheap source of labour as they do not demand as high a pay as compared to educated locals, allowing their respective companies to cut down on their cost of production and hence bring great economic benefits to a country. Additionally, there are those who say that migrants introduce cultural diversity into a country, enriching the culture and providing more eye-opening experiences. One classic example is food. When migrants come into a country, they can start food establishments that cater to their countrymen. This is illustrated by the Turkish migration in the UK, without which there would not be a myriad of restaurants serving Turkish cuisine today, and the same is seen in other cultures. Hence, it can be understood why some vehemently deny that migrants are a threat to the society due to the many benefits reaped by a country due to their presence.

However, upon deeper analysis, it is reasonable to believe that migrants are a threat to a country. There are migrants who do not feel loyal to their migrated country and thus return home taking more than they give. While it is perfectly sound behaviour on the migrants' part to earn their money and then retire back in their local country, this denies the host country of the long-term benefits of their presence. The number of transient migrant workers has been increasing in recent years due to globalisation, which causes transport and travelling to be much more convenient. This is evidenced by how many South Koreans, Indonesians and Malaysians move to Singapore to allow their children to enjoy the benefits of the Singapore education only to return to their respective countries equipped with new skills and knowledge but no longer benefiting Singapore. Hence, it is apparent that migrant workers benefit more from the host country than what the host country benefits from them and thus they are considered more as a threat to the country.

Furthermore, migrants can cause more prominent and obvious harm to a country, thus posing a threat. Many migrants do not see the importance of adapting to the host country's culture and behaviour,
