

19. F Biodiversity usually decreases during succession as pioneer species are replaced by climax species.

Multiple Choice

20. D Which term describes a relationship where both species benefit from close interaction?
a. parasitism      b. commensalism      c. predation      d. mutualism
21. B Which statement best describes a keystone species?
a. little community impact      b. loss disrupts community      c. produces all energy      d. most abundant species
22. A Which situation is the best example of secondary succession?
a. regrowing forest      b. new lava rock      c. evaporating water      d. advancing glacier

Short Answer

23. Explain the main difference between interspecific and intraspecific competition, and give one example of each.

Interspecific competition occurs between different species, such as lions and hyenas competing for prey; while intraspecific competition occurs within the same species, such as trees of the same species crowding each other for light.

24. How can niche partitioning allow similar species to coexist in the same habitat?

Niche partitioning allows species to use different parts of a resource, such as birds feeding at different tree heights, which reduces direct competition so similar species can coexist in the same area.

25. Describe how primary succession and secondary succession differ in their starting conditions.

Primary succession starts on surfaces without soil, like bare rock after a lava flow; while secondary succession starts where soil and some organisms remain after a disturbance such as a forest fire or farming.

Open Response

26. How do community interactions such as competition, symbiosis, and keystone species influence the process of ecological succession and the development of a climax community?

Competition can shape which species survive and dominate at each stage of succession by favoring organisms that use resources more efficiently. Symbiotic relationships like mutualism can help pioneer and later species establish by providing benefits such as pollination or nutrient support. Keystone species can maintain biodiversity during succession by preventing any one species from taking over the community. As interactions stabilize and resources are more fully divided, the community becomes more complex and resilient. Together these interactions guide which species persist so that a relatively stable climax community can eventually develop under consistent environmental conditions.
