Executive pay is a complex issue. It is not just about the amount of money paid to executives, but also about the structure of the compensation package. This includes base salary, bonus, and long-term incentives like stock options and restricted stock. The compensation committee is responsible for setting these levels. They must consider the company's performance, the executive's role, and the market for similar positions. The goal is to attract and retain top talent while ensuring that the compensation is fair and competitive.

There are several factors that influence executive pay. One is the company's performance. If the company is doing well, executives are likely to receive higher pay. Another factor is the executive's experience and skills. More experienced executives with rare skills can command higher pay. The market for executives is also a factor. If there is a shortage of qualified candidates, companies may have to offer higher pay to attract them. Finally, the compensation committee's composition and process can also affect the outcome. A diverse and independent committee is more likely to set appropriate pay levels.
