

THE BATTLE TACTICS OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT

INTRODUCTION

"France beat the armies of the First Coalition¹ by massing poorly trained and disciplined but enthusiastic recruits in deep columns which moved forward irresistibly. They won, but the price in casualties was great. ... the whole front was covered by an irregular swarm of skirmishers, called tirailleurs. This light infantry shielded the columns behind them and disorganised the main line of the enemy ahead..."²

Napoleon and his generals defeated almost all the armies of Europe using these tactics, and the assault of massed columns of infantry was decisive in almost all his battles.

But the tactics failed totally, in Spain and Portugal once Arthur Wellesley, the later Duke of Wellington, took command of the British and allied forces there. And, in the end, Napoleon's tactics failed again at Waterloo.

So what were the tactics of the British army under Wellington:

"The army would take up a defensive position on a reverse slope with protected flanks, with a powerful line of skirmishers in front, and artillery dispersed, but well forward. If the French attacked, their tirailleurs were neutralized and their columns destroyed by musketry from the thin red lines."³

Put simply, against the French massed columns, Wellington used battalions of infantry in line formation, no more than three ranks deep. The slopes they hid behind protected them from the French artillery, the 'tirailleurs were neutralized' by British skirmishers, and when the French columns finally came in range they were devastated by concentrated British musket fire. These tactics were successfully used in a string of battles in the Iberian Peninsula, including Vimero, Talavera, Busaco, Salamanca and Vittoria, against famous French Marshals and Generals such as Junot, Ney, Soult, Marmont, and Napoleon's own brother, Joseph.

Consider this brief extract from Jac Weller's description of the battle of Talavera:

The main French was made by two 12-battalion Divisions (15,000 men), one column following the other with each battalion marching "30 men broad and 15 ranks deep". Opposing them was a British "Division of 6,000 men ... in a single two-deep line". "The British line appears to have divided into twelve small crescents ... each across the head of one of the French columns. Every British musket could fire effectively; only about 1,300 Frenchmen could reply. ... The heads of each column melted away under steady rolling fire."⁴

So what does all this have to do with Alexander's battle tactics? Actually, quite a lot.

Both the French massed columns and the British thin red lines are examples of tactical innovations that continually defeated their army's enemies in battle. In each case this
