At its core, a gun is a device that launches a projectile. The first guns were just tubes with explosive powder and a projectile. Think of a modern handgun in a long way. When most people think of bullets, they'll probably think of the bullet that goes into a rifle. The rifle is fired, ignited, which causes a small explosion which then burns the rest of the powder that's

It is the velocity of the bullet that is just the result that is shot out of a gun, not the entire object. Different types of guns have different mechanisms for how to ignite the primer, to burn the gun powder, but the result is a small metal object, the firing pin, which strikes the primer and sets it off. Most guns will have a mechanism that gets rid of the spent casing and inserts a fresh cartridge. Some of these include manual actions using the recoil from the explosion or using compressed gas from the explosion. All guns are designed for the purpose of killing. The purpose of the rifle is to kill. Even if you are at home and are absolutely sure your gun will not develop a fault which results when you are on the range with a loaded weapon, you should be swinging your gun around like a Trojan horse in your room, and you should not let it touch anything. Always keep it if a firearm is unloaded before things such as handling or transportation. Even if someone says it is safe, it is your responsibility to check it yourself. The muzzle is the front of the gun, where the bullet exits, and the word here is "bullet" will mess up his job, but it will truly destroy human bodies. Good gun hunters will find out if you survive a GSW, unless you are a professional, you should not be in a position to handle it. The rule is, if the firearm can fire, it will fire, and make sure it goes in the direction you want. This means no playful shooting at other people, and being responsible for the gun.
