

The Great Depression

The stock market crash and the Great Depression were two significant events in American history that had a profound impact on people's lives. These events occurred in the 1930s and led to widespread economic hardship.

The Stock Market Crash

The stock market crash, also known as Black Tuesday, happened on October 29, 1929. On this day, the stock market experienced a sudden and severe decline in prices. Many people had invested their savings in the stock market, hoping to make a profit. However, as stock prices plummeted, panic set in, and investors rushed to sell their stocks. This massive sell-off led to a collapse in the stock market, wiping out the savings of many individuals and businesses.

The Great Depression Unfolds

Following the stock market crash, the United States experienced an economic downturn known as the Great Depression. One of the immediate consequences was a bank run, where worried depositors rushed to withdraw their money from banks. This led to widespread bank failures and a loss of savings for many Americans.

Economic Factors and Impact

The Great Depression was worsened by a decline in the demand for American goods. As businesses struggled, they had to cut back on production and lay off workers, leading to high unemployment rates. Agricultural was hit particularly hard. The Dust Bowl, a severe drought combined with poor farming practices, devastated farmlands and left many farmers without livelihoods.
