

3. (a) Explain how the overuse of common access resources can lead to negative externalities. [10]

Negative externalities are the negative costs for third parties that are not involved in the transactions of goods and services and whose interests are not taken into account. Therefore, the market does not achieve allocative efficiency as the marginal social benefits (MSB) is not equal to the marginal social costs (MSC). The overuse of common access resources are natural resources that do not have ownership status and are non-excludable resources, meaning that no one can be deprived of it but are also rivalrous goods, where one's usage of the resources diminishes the benefit to others in society. This results in the tragedy of the commons, where the lack of private ownership results in firms acting on their self interest, and thus causing the depletion of natural resources such as forestry, oceans and air.

The diagram illustrates the negative externalities arising from overconsumption of common access resources. Common access resources are being consumed at the quantity level  $Q_m$ , where the MPB are greater than the MSB - where the vertical shift represents the value of external costs, as these firms are acting on self interest in producing from these resources. Due to the demand curve representing the MPB, the price is above its equilibrium where the firms earn an increased amount of revenue. As a result of the MPB being greater than MSB, a welfare loss is present as seen from the shaded region beneath the supply curve.

The mass exploitation of common access resources results in market failure, as the consumption and production of common access resources such as forestry and oceans can lead to detrimental environmental damage and resource depletion for future production. With the environmental depletion and damage caused, this in turn, affects third parties that are not involved with the action of producing from common access resources - thus representing the creation of negative externality consumption.
