

ACTIVITY-BASED COSTING

ANSWERS TO REVIEW QUESTIONS

8.1 "Volume based cost driver" is often a misnomer. The term is used to refer to applying overhead to products on the basis of data that varies with the volume of production. The overhead rates are therefore often based on direct labour hours, amount of direct material, direct labour cost, machine hours or number of units produced. However, increasingly large amounts of overhead are now not dependent on output volumes. For example, large volumes of output can come from a few large batches and a product with low total production may need to be produced in small batches. The costs associated with reconfiguring processing equipment and other set-up costs that are incurred for a batch do not change in amount according to production-volume based variables such as direct labour hours or machine hours. These volume-based data do not, therefore, "drive" the costs. In fact they can result in the over-allocation of set-up costs to large-batch products and under-allocation to small-batch products, with one subsidising the other.

In modern manufacturing environments these problems have increased in the last few decades due to increased automation, the increase in the proportion of total cost that is classified as overhead, and the increase in the costs themselves. The misallocation of overhead due to using traditional volume-based data becomes a greater problem when the amount of overhead being misallocated grows in size.

Instructors can usefully discuss at this point other overhead costs that are not driven by production volumes or their proxy measures, such as direct labour hours and machine hours.

8.2 Over time, costing systems that were originally adequate for their purpose may increasingly lead to poor decisions. Product diversity and a decline in the proportion of costs that are for labour create the likelihood of errors in the costings. A growth in the proportion of costs that are for overheads increases the size of errors. In addition, the more competitive the market for the firm's products, the more costly the erroneous decisions will be! This scenario is not true of all industries but it is very widespread.

Common indicators that the costing system is no longer appropriate for the current operating environment of the firm include: production managers want to drop products that they believe are too costly to make, but which the costing system shows are profitable; profit margins are difficult to explain; complex products appear to have high profit margins; production and marketing managers develop supplementary costing systems upon which they place greater credence; frequent requests for special costing studies; some products do not have any competition in the market whereas others appear to have a market price below or marginally above the cost of production; price increases do not affect demand; bids for complex products are easily won but bids for simple products are not competitive.

8.3 The vertical dimension is the cost assignment dimension, where the costs of resources are assigned to activities using resource drivers. Then activity costs are assigned to the products according to their activity consumption, using activity drivers. The horizontal dimension is the activity management dimension, which provides information about the work done in the business. This includes the causes (or root cause cost drivers) of activities and measures of activity performance.

The costs of the resources are assigned to each activity using resource drivers. The costs of the resources are recorded already in the existing accounting system and include items such as wages, supplies and building occupancy costs. An activity is a unit of work performed within the organisation. A resource driver is a cost driver that estimates the cost of resources used by an activity. Examples include floor space, which may be used to assign building costs, or the number of employees, which may be used to assign wages. Some costs can be traced directly to an activity rather than using resource drivers. For example, wages can often be traced directly to an activity by identifying the person that performs the activity.
