

Guidelines for Writing Scholarly Papers

Writing, even just a brief essay, is one of the most difficult tasks that you will face in college. It comes more naturally to some than to others, but it is almost never easy. And like everything else, writing clearly and effectively requires practice. This handout seeks to address the basics of writing, but there is no substitute for actually sitting down and putting your thoughts on paper in logical and coherent form.

Scholarly writing has its own set of rules and conventions that are different from those of creative or technical writing. Formal academic writing is expected to conform to these standards, the most important of which are outlined below.

Basic Structure:

The introductory paragraph should engage the reader's interest by setting out clearly the question that the paper is attempting to address, how you plan to address it, and why it is worth addressing in the first place. Often it is wise to begin with a brief story or anecdote, or a particularly powerful statistic, or an appropriate quotation. The key here is to make the reader want to keep reading.

The thesis statement is a summation of your main point; this should generally appear at the end of the introductory paragraph. Before writing, try phrasing your thesis as a simple assertion ("The planet is running out of manganese"), and then develop it as you write by being as specific (and, indeed, as provocative) as you can: "Thanks to over-mining by American corporations, there is a very real possibility that the next generation will be forced to live in a world without manganese."

You should then provide background information, basic material about the subject, to provide context for the reader. Continuing the above example, you would want to say something about what manganese is and what it is used for. Depending on the amount of background you think is necessary, you might want to include this in the introductory paragraph; for longer essays a separate paragraph (or more) may be required.

The real "meat" of your paper will be the actual points of discussion. These will be a series of paragraphs that support your thesis statement, with each point occupying one or two paragraphs, depending on the essay's overall length. In this case, one might showcase statistics on how much manganese there is left in the world; another could contain statistics on how quickly the manganese supply is being depleted. The actual number of points, of course, depends on how much you have to say.
