

Literary, Long-Form, or Narrative Journalism

KOBIE VAN KRIEKEN

Radboud University, The Netherlands

The concepts of literary journalism, long-form journalism, and narrative journalism all refer to a journalistic genre that employs narrative storytelling techniques to report upon real-world events and situations. These storytelling techniques originate from literary fiction and include point-of-view writing, dialogues, thought representations, vivid details that may carry symbolic meaning, and the use of a chronological event structure rather than an inverted pyramid structure. The genre thus resembles literary fiction in terms of its style and structure, with the difference that its content is factual. Whereas the label of long-form journalism exclusively refers to written articles of considerable length—typically 2,000 words or more—that are published online or in print, the labels of narrative journalism and literary journalism are often used interchangeably, both covering a broad palette of journalistic products. Prototypical products include feature articles and historical books as well as podcasts and documentaries.

The narrative nature of journalism has been long acknowledged. News texts follow the macrostructure of oral stories with clearly identifiable elements such as an abstract, climax, and resolution (Bell, 1991). The news actors are typically portrayed in such a way that, upon scrutiny, they can be recognized as mythical archetypes that can be traced back to Greek tragedies, including heroes, victims, and tricksters (Marsh, 2010). Although all forms of journalism display these structural and mythical elements to a certain extent, narrative journalism exploits them to approximate literary prose as closely as possible. From this perspective, contemporary narrative journalism can be considered a return to the early days of print journalism. News texts already in the eighteenth and nineteenth century resembled fictional stories in terms of their structural and stylistic form. It was not uncommon for a news text to describe events from the subjective viewpoint of one or more persons involved and to relate the events in the temporal order in which these persons experienced them, thus postponing the disclosure of the most critical and newsworthy event until the middle or end of the story. Moreover, on-scene dialogues were frequently reconstructed while source attributions were scarce, resulting in compelling news stories with literary flow (Hartsock, 2000; Van Krieken & Sanders, 2016). As a result of the movement toward an objective journalism in the early twentieth century, journalists and editors started favoring the inverted pyramid structure, with its emphasis on informative value rather than personal value, over the narrative structure.

The revival of narrative journalism in the 1960s and 1970s became known as the New Journalism, an influential American movement with journalists and writers Tom Wolfe, Guy Talésé, Norman Mailer, and Truman Capote as important figureheads. The
