Y. Hess,1979 Performance Evaluation of In-service, Elevated Temperature Industrial Insulation ,1978 A purchaser of industrial insulation is concerned with many factors which bear on the type of insulation selected One of the most important factors undoubtedly is the thermal conductivity The thermal conductivity is a measure of the ability of an insulation to conduct heat The lower this value the better the insulation appears to the buyer In the past it was generally assumed that the conductivity during the life of the insulation could be taken as a fixed property so long as external influences such as moisture or physical damage do not occur Due to the dramatic increase in the cost and availability of energy in recent years investigation of the validity of this long standing assumption is in order The purpose of this study was to determine whether deterioration of industrial insulation does occur and if so attempt to identify the reasons In order to accomplish this it was necessary to first develop methods by which the conductivity could be determined in the field Once this was accomplished a field test program was implemented It was determined from this program that there was a significant difference between the conductivity values obtained and those which were expected from manufacturer s data However this variation was not attributable to any of the factors investigated and could be due to either inherent measurement inaccuracies or the tendency of manufacturers data to overestimate performance
