properties of MATTER

Properties are used to describe matter. Properties can be measured through observations. Things we touch, see, hear, see, taste or by measurement. Properties can be categorized as a physical property or a chemical property.

Physical properties can be identified without changing the identity of the substance. The texture, odor, appearance, colour and hardness of an object are examples of physical properties.

A physical property is any property that is evident without a chemical reaction.

Chemical properties are different than physical properties because they require a chemical change for the property to be observed. Flammability (catching fire) and rust are examples of chemical properties because they involve changing the original substance.

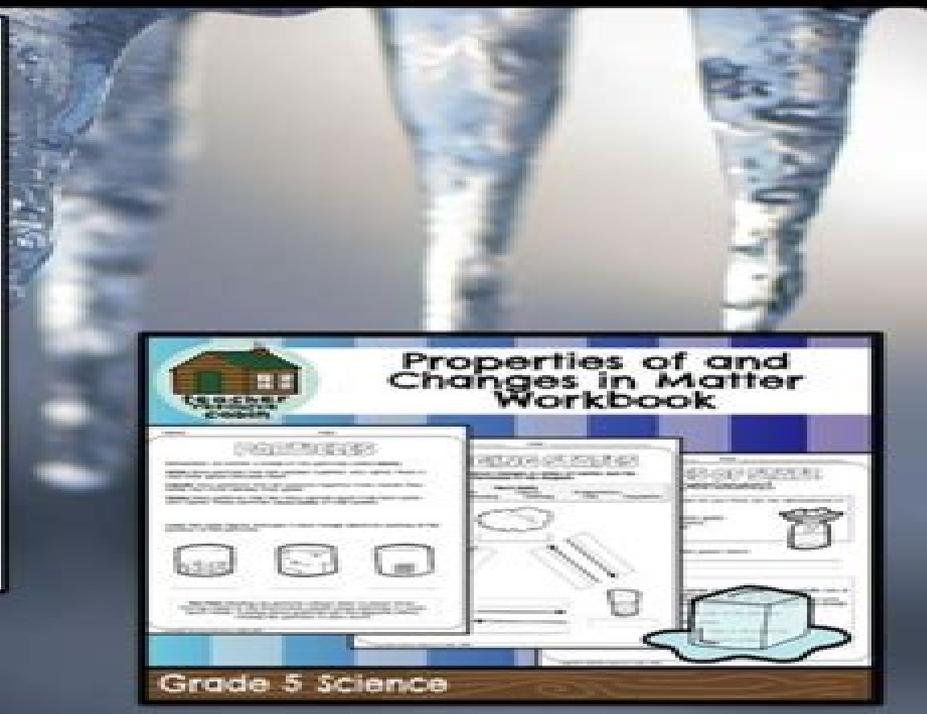

A chemical property is any a property that becomes evident during, or after, a chemical change.

A physical change is different than a chemical change. A physical change occurs when the object changes states without changing what the substance is. For example, water freezing or salt dissolving in water.

Physical changes are reversible. That means they can be undone. Chemical changes are irreversible. They are permanent.
