

Lab 9 (8214) Fetal Pig Dissection

Name and ID: _____

Grade: /35.5 _____

Dissection Instructions:

1. Observe the following external structures before beginning any dissection. The body can be divided into head, neck, trunk and tail regions. On the ventral side of the head is the mouth, bounded by fleshy lips and cheeks which enable the young pig to suckle. External nostrils or nares, the entrance for air into the respiratory system, are located on the end of the snout. The eyes have eyelids as well as a nictitating membrane (third eyelid) at the medial corner of the eye. This membrane can expand across the eyeball to help keep it clean. Humans have only a vestige of this membrane. The external ear consists of a fleshy flap called the auricle or pinna, to collect sound waves, and the external acoustic meatus, the passage through which sound travels to the eardrum. The trunk can be subdivided into the thorax, encased by the ribs, and the abdomen. The umbilical cord is attached to the midventral surface of the abdomen and connects the fetus to the placenta.

In the male, the preputial orifice of the penis is found directly posterior to the umbilical cord. The scrotum, containing the testes, develops posterior to the hind legs; it is inconspicuous in the fetal pig (still internalized). The anus is located directly ventral to the tail.

In females, the urogenital orifice, a common opening for both the vagina and urinary tract, is ventral to the anus (tail). The urogenital orifice is bounded laterally by labia, folds of tissue which form a spike-like genital papilla over the orifice.

Mammary papillae are found on the ventral surface in both males and females. In mature females, the mammary papillae develop into teats.
