1. Are emotions and intelligence two separate domains? Or do they overlap? E. L. Thorndike, who was influential in popularising the notions of IQ in the first half of the 20th century once proposed that 'social intelligence', an aspect of emotional intelligence that demonstrates the ability to understand others and act suitably in social and personal relations, was itself an aspect of a person's IQ.
2. In the second half of the 20th century, however, personal and social intelligence were largely dismissed by theorists of IQ as being a fashionable concept that had little use. But these intelligences could not be ignored for long. Common sense and intuition are what drive personal intelligence. In a study where people were asked to list the qualities of an intelligent person, it was these two qualities that were among the main points listed. Subsequent research proved that social and personal intelligence is distinct from academic abilities which makes up the greater part of IQ. But they are an intrinsic part of what makes people do well in life.
3. In recent years, it has been conceded that while IQ, based on math and language skills, will make a person do well in the classroom, it will be of less and less influence as life goes beyond the classroom. Today, a wider view of intelligence is taken. It is being defined as abilities that make a person lead life successfully – and those abilities are different from the skills required to do well at school. There is no doubt now that personal and social intelligence have a great say in how successful one is in life.
4. Emotional intelligence, which includes personal and social intelligence, can be explained under the following heads:
 - Knowing one's emotions – being aware of oneself is the bedrock of emotional intelligence. If we cannot understand our feelings, we become slaves to our emotions and let them overtake us.
 - Managing emotions – this ability derives from the ability to understand
