If you are a composer and/or arranger and will be writing/scoring for clarinet, you might be wondering which clarinet or clarinets to choose, which clarinets to form a clarinet section or which clarinets to combine with other instruments. As you surely already know, there are many different kinds of clarinets to choose from – some with varying degrees of availability – so how does one choose which one/s to write for? This document might help you decide which clarinet – or constellation of clarinets – is right for your new composition or arrangement.

It's important to note at this stage that a lot of the information contained in this document is generalised and that an attempt has been made to remain as objective as possible – even though describing the sound of instruments is very much a subjective practice – so as to not favour one clarinet or the other. The descriptions are based on existing repertoire and my experience of the sound of the instrument. There are so many aspects to each and every instrument just as there are manifold considerations for every composition. The information is intended to give you more insight into the nature of each clarinet.

If you happen to be reading this because you are writing for me, I play Boehm-system clarinets, often called French system. Most of the clarinetists on the planet play this system. Oehler-system, or more commonly German system is played predominantly in Germany and Austria, and then relegated mostly to orchestras. The following descriptions of the sound of each instrument can be applied to both Boehm and Oehler-system instruments.

When it comes to extended techniques – especially multiphonics – there are quite large differences between the two systems, as you may already know. For Boehm-clarinets, there are well-known books by Bartolozzi, Farmer, Rehfeldt, Richards and Spinaay that all deal with extended techniques, so you can feel free to use these as a reference. If you need a text for Oehler-system, Krassnitzer's Masters Thesis is worth a look.

If you are looking for extended techniques for a more rare instrument, for which there is not yet a dedicated book, you can adopt techniques for eg. B-flat or bass clarinet and apply them to 'nearby' clarinets, bearing in mind that the results may vary. Here's an overview:

A-flat, E-flat, C, B-flat, A clarinets – charts for any high clarinet clarinet d'amore – mostly high clarinet charts, some aspects of bass clarinet charts basset horn – mostly bass clarinet charts, some aspects of high clarinet charts bass clarinet – charts for bass clarinet contralto, contrabass clarinets – dedicated charts for these instruments

It's extremely important to check anything from these books/charts with the player for whom you are writing and on the specific instrument in mind!

Clarinets come in many sizes and transpositions and were developed for different contexts such as salon/chamber, folk, military and orchestral music. The individual sonic characteristics of each clarinet can bestow your music with a unique sound, particularly when used in inventive instrumental combinations.
