Technological Change: E-commerce

6. The Factors Influencing Whether, Why and How Businesses Respond to the Growth of E-commerce

Case Study: Blockbuster

Many of the key threats to existing businesses (especially in retail) of e-commerce stem from the increase in competition. In 2004 there were 9,000 Blockbuster DVD (and game) rental stores in the USA alone, and around 1,000 in the UK; however, by 2013 the company had effectively ceased to exist. The original Blockbuster success story during the late 1980s onwards – a new technology (videos and then DVDs/Blu-rays and games) meant that people could enjoy films at a time of their convenience in a place of their choosing. Therefore, rather than having to travel to more expensive cinemas which may be some distance away and have limited showings, you had flexibility. Visiting a cinema was more expensive, partly because of the higher costs of operating a property in prime retail space and partly because of the number of employees required.

The original Blockbuster was one of many video rental stores, but what it did was store more titles (which gave more choice), manage its stock with a computer system (improving stock control and efficiency) and brand itself as a family store. Relatively rapid expansion enabled it to benefit from economies of scale, and the resulting cost advantages this offered allowed Blockbuster to lower rental price as the market matured and expand overseas. This marked the high point in the Blockbuster story, because by 1993 the rental market was starting to mature with the growth of satellite TV and other competitors. As a consequence the company embarked upon a relatively unsuccessful venture into the music market, and a complex and expensive merger with the media giant Viacom badly affected the cash flow and profitability of Blockbuster.

This background is important because by 1998, when the company floated (relatively unsuccessfully) on the stock exchange, Amazon and Netflix had arrived on the scene. Relatively poor cash flow, unsuccessful mergers and a loss of faith from investors did not provide a good environment for the necessary changes to be made to compete with the emerging companies.

People used to actually rent their films from a shop.
