Paper Example: Evolutionary Biology Essay

Evolution biology refers to the change in species' characteristics over several generations. This process relies on natural selection, and the theory that it is based on is that species have similar characteristics and they change slowly over time. For evolution to take place, there must be a change in the genetic composition of a specific population. This affects the phenotype of the specific species, and some of the resulting characteristics may be advantageous to the organism and hence can be passed to the offspring. Different journals have been written to explain this gradual change in organisms that lead to either an advantage that can be passed to the next generations or a disadvantage.

Behavior is a contributing factor in evolution, but the idea has been faced with up and downs over the past few centuries (Uller). Lamarck and Darwin guarded this view, but it was faced with objection from the Weismann's mutation theory. This theory suggests that evolution of species occurs through sudden alterations in the characteristics of a species that are not expected. The theory joined two traditional evolution thoughts that seemed to present contrary views. One of these theories was Saltationist theory which suggests that new species of a particular organism are produced through a rapid process through transformations that are not continuous.

This theory was contradictory to the Darwin theory which holds the view that species evolve gradually through variations (Uller). Darwin theory is distinct from the Saltationist theory. He did not agree that there existed the development of traits that were undesirable to the species. The mutations theory tend to strongly emphasize that all the changes in the species are beneficial and that no trait is not desirable. One of the advantages of variation in the species is helping it to survive in a varying environment. Evolution occurs through natural selection as per the theory of Charles Darwin. Individuals have distinct characteristics which occur through a natural process.

Behavioral Ecology

Behavioral Ecology is the study of the evolution of living organisms due to ecological pressures that make the animals change to be able to survive in a particular environment. The environments keep on changing; therefore the living organisms are forced to evaluate to suit the changes occurring on the environment. Organisms have traits that enable them to live in that environment, and other organisms face challenges living in the same environment because they don't have the necessary traits to live in that environment. The article examines the evolution that has to occur in organisms for them to be able to live in new environments.

The behavior of animals can ultimately be predicted depending on the environment that the organisms are found because the environment makes the organisms to have similar traits to survive under the conditions that the environment provides. Scientists do the predictions of the behavior of the organisms based on the environment and ecological factors that exist within a particular environment (Zollner). The behavioral ecology is trying to study living organisms to come up with solutions on how you can make the organisms fit on the environment better and fix the challenges that they might be facing. Research is also being done on how organisms can be made to live in the environments that they are not used to.
