5 Minute Marriage Makeover

The #1 Misdiagnosed Relationship Issue
Experienced By Ever-Married

Put it to the essential test for your relationship

Negative Cycles Continued...

Negative cycles are bidirectional. This means each partner's behavior influences the behavior of the other.

Each partner plays a role in a negative cycle. Often one is a critical person and the other is a defensive person.

The Person is afraid of being rejected, abandoned, or criticized. They seek reassurance from their spouse and will often try gently at first to get through. If this person they are not heard, they will escalate their attempts to be noticed through demands, complaints, criticisms, and pressure for change. Sometimes they expect to not be heard, so they automatically begin to "push" their spouse intensely without a soft approach first.

The Avoider person is distance themselves emotionally from others, including their spouse, and remain emotionally independent. They can be distrustful of their relationship partner or fearful of getting hurt. So they engage in an avoiding type of behavior. They'll be tactlessly involved, change difficult topics, avoid discussions, or even walk away.

Avoider often interpret their Partner's person's pleas for connection as criticism. They interpret criticism as "I am not good enough" or "You don't respect me". Then they push further away, becoming defensive, which causes the person to increase their pursuit.

Good news: Every couple will have some criticism and defensiveness in their relationship. They also have negative cycles.
