

Unit 9: Human Regulation and Reproduction

Regulation of the cardiovascular and respiratory systems

Introduction

The human body is made up of different systems such as the nervous system. The main function of the nervous system is that it generates, transmits, and interprets impulses from and to the different body systems. The nervous system is divided into two main different organisations that include the central nervous system (CNS) and the peripheral nervous system (PNS). The flowchart below shows the different divisions of the nervous system:

As shown in the above diagram, the two components of the CNS are the brain and the spinal cord. The function of the brain is to receive and process sensory information as well as initiate responses but also to store memories, generate thoughts and emotions. Alternatively, the function of the spinal cord is to conduct signals from and to the brain as well as controlling any type of reflex activities. However, the PNS is different from the CNS. This is because, it is separated into two groups that are named as the somatic nervous system (SNS) and the autonomic nervous system (ANS). The SNS is also known as the voluntary nervous system and its function is to control the conscious tasks such as writing whereas the function of the ANS, also known as the involuntary nervous system, is to control the unconscious tasks such as digestion.

The ANS is further divided into two categories that are very distinct from one another and they consist of the parasympathetic nervous system and the sympathetic nervous system. The parasympathetic nervous system consists of maintaining the functions of the body in an individual's everyday life. For example, a few actions that the parasympathetic nervous system carries out on the body is that slows down the heartbeat, it also stimulates the flow of the saliva and constricts pupils. Alternatively, the sympathetic nervous system prepares the reaction in an individual's body in emergency situations. For example, a few of the actions that the sympathetic nervous system carries out on an individual's body include the dilation of pupils, the acceleration of the heartbeat, and inhibition of the flow of saliva.

The nervous system is also made up of neurons that are cells that transmit electrical impulses in the form of action potentials between the brain and the body tissues and organs. Sensory and motor neurons are found in the PNS. Another type of neuron is a relay neuron, which is mostly found in the CNS. They all have different functions as the sensory neurons, which are also known as afferent neurons, carry impulses from the receptors to the CNS, whereas relay neurones, which are also known as interneurons, connect the sensory neurones to the motor neurones in the CNS allowing the motor neurons, which are also known as the efferent neurones, to carry the impulses from the CNS to an effector to allow movement to take place. The structure of the different neurons is shown below:
