

Ecosystem Interactions & Energy Flow

Name: _____

Class: _____

Passage C: Population Dynamics and Ecological Succession

Populations in ecosystems rarely stay perfectly stable. Their sizes change in response to available resources, predation, disease, and human activities. When conditions are favorable and resources are plentiful, a population may grow rapidly. However, every environment has a carrying capacity—the maximum number of individuals that the habitat can support over time. As a population approaches carrying capacity, competition for resources increases and growth slows. Disturbances such as fires, floods, or human clearing of land can disrupt ecosystems. After a disturbance, ecological succession begins. In primary succession, organisms colonize bare rock where no soil exists, such as after a volcanic eruption. In secondary succession, a community recovers where soil is still present, such as after a forest fire. Over time, species composition changes until a relatively stable community develops, although further disturbances can restart the process.

Multiple Choice:

1. What is carrying capacity?

- A) The number of species in an ecosystem.
- B) The maximum population size that an environment can support over time.
- C) The fastest growth rate possible for a population.
- D) The amount of energy available at the producer level.

2. Which situation is an example of secondary succession?

- A) Lichens growing on bare rock after a new lava flow.
- B) Plants colonizing sand on a newly formed island.
- C) A forest regrowing after a fire that left the soil in place.
- D) Bacteria appearing in a sterile petri dish.

Answer the Following:

3. Describe one factor that can cause a population to decrease.

4. Explain how human activities can change the carrying capacity for a species.

5. Compare primary and secondary succession in terms of starting conditions.
