Monarch Butterflies: Incredible Migration

Monarch butterflies are famous for their long-distance migration. They travel from the northeastern United States and southern Canada to central Mexico each year. The journey is a remarkable feat, as they fly over thousands of miles and across several oceans.

The migration begins in the fall when the weather turns cool. The butterflies start by flying south, following a path that is passed down from one generation to the next. They fly for several days, resting on flowers and trees along the way. The journey is not without challenges, as they must avoid predators and harsh weather conditions.

By the time they reach Mexico, the butterflies are exhausted. They spend the winter in a state of dormancy, huddled together in dense forests. In the spring, they begin their journey back north, following the same path as the previous generation. The migration is a testament to the incredible resilience and adaptability of these beautiful creatures.
