- Successful conclusions are those which step back and form an independent judgement on the issues discussed.
- Do not contradict opinions expressed in an essay.
- Focus carefully on the specific wording of the question.
- Provide appropriate examples to support ideas and opinions.
- Avoid listing examples or describing examples in too much detail.
- Evaluation, an important feature of an argument, is the ability to step back and offer an independent judgement on the issues discussed and should be included as part of the argument.

General comments

The key words in questions were recognised and acted upon by many candidates. There was some misreading of Question 4, where 'safer' was seen as 'easier'. Most of the introductory paragraphs were interesting and focused; examples were often included and these were always expanded upon in subsequent paragraphs. Some candidates could have gained higher credit with the addition of a conclusion.

Although errors were frequent in some essays, it was rare to come across an essay where communication was impeded seriously. Candidates need to use clear paragraphing to structure their argument. A simple way to link paragraphs throughout an essay is to pick a word, phrase or name from the preceding paragraph and use this in the first sentence of the subsequent paragraph, while ensuring that a fresh point is the focus of all paragraphs in the body of the essay. A good example is a response to Question 6 on electric cars. The essay's introduction contained the sentence 'scientists are striving for ways to reduce pollution.' The opening sentence of the next paragraph was 'many of these scientists are committed to electric car development as one of the ways to create a more sustainable planet.' The simple mention of 'scientists' maintains continuity. This essay continued to link paragraphs culminating in a conclusion that was effective because it did not simply summarise the points already made, raising further questions in the reader's mind, something that candidates should strive to do.

There were some impressive, fluent, imaginative responses. In contrast, the use of everyday language e.g. 'don't get me wrong' and 'this might sound crazy' sometimes resulted in an informal, conversational essay using shortened forms and colloquial expression. Candidates should communicate in a formal, academic way. The use of contractions, slang expressions, conversational openings and endings of paragraphs, as well as speculative rhetorical questions were very common. Overuse of metaphors and attempts to employ more complex phrases and vocabulary sometimes did not work and led to misunderstanding. Generally, this did not prevent the overall meaning being lost.

Candidates can improve by avoiding the use of overlong sentences and using punctuation to effectively sequence points. Common errors included the overuse of prepositions, using 'although' at the start of sentences rendering such sentences non-sentences and the overuse of informal words such as: 'stuff', 'ok', 'okay', 'pros and cons'. There was evidence of tense and agreement problems such as: 'computer technology are...'. There were many occasions of overuse of direct, colloquial address 'think about it', 'don't get me wrong' and 'this might sound crazy'. Confusion between 'amount' and 'number', 'less' and 'fewer' was also evident. 'In a nutshell' was used by some candidates in their conclusions – this is informal and
