Key Summary

Gasland is a documentary film that explores the complex and controversial issue of water rights in the United States. The film follows a man, Mark Maguire, as he travels across the country, testing tap water for methane gas. He discovers that in many areas, the water contains methane gas, which is a byproduct of natural gas extraction. This discovery leads to a series of events, including a lawsuit against a water utility company and a battle with the government over water rights. The film is a powerful and thought-provoking work that raises important questions about the environment, energy, and the future of water in America.

This documentary is a key text for students studying the environmental movement in the United States. It provides a detailed and accessible overview of the complex issues surrounding water rights and natural gas extraction. The film is a powerful and thought-provoking work that raises important questions about the environment, energy, and the future of water in America. It is a key text for students studying the environmental movement in the United States.
