Introduction

Pre-Lab

1. If two parents are homozygous recessive for earlobes, will they have children with attached or unattached earlobes? _____

In this laboratory, you will discover that the same principles of genetics apply to humans as they do to plants and fruit flies. A gene has two alternate forms, called alleles, for any trait, such as hairline, finger length, and so on. One possible allele, designated by an uppercase letter, is dominant over the recessive allele, designated by a lowercase letter. An individual can be homozygous dominant (two dominant alleles, EE), homozygous recessive (two recessive alleles, ee), or heterozygous (one dominant and one recessive allele, Ee). Genotype refers to an individual's alleles, and phenotype refers to an individual's appearance (Fig. 11.1). Homozygous dominant and also heterozygous individuals show the dominant phenotype; homozygous recessive individuals show the recessive phenotype.

Figure 11.1 Genotype versus phenotype. Unattached earlobes (E) are dominant over attached earlobes (e). a. Homozygous dominant individuals have unattached earlobes. b. Homozygous recessive individuals have attached earlobes. c. Heterozygous individuals have unattached earlobes.
