Index Fossils Lab

Background Information

Index fossils are the fossil remains from the past. They are the remains of ancient life that lived millions of years ago and can tell us a great deal about the history of our planet. These fossils are used by scientists to date rocks and sediment layers, and to piece together the evolutionary history of different species.

Imagine taking a journey back in time. It is now 65 million years ago. You would discover a world of strange creatures that are long extinct, such as dinosaurs, mammoths, and trilobites. These creatures have left behind their remains, which we now call index fossils.

Index fossils are species that lived during a specific period of time and had a widespread distribution. This means that they are found in different rocks and sediment layers, because they grew up in other locations of the globe. For example, if a rock layer contains the fossil of a trilobite that is only known to have lived between 400 and 300 million years ago, we can confidently say that the rock is around that age.

The use of index fossils has revolutionized the field of geology and paleontology, allowing scientists to create detailed timelines of Earth's history. By studying the local distribution of different species, they have been able to piece together the world we live in today and how it has changed over time.

But index fossils aren't just useful for scientists - they're also fascinating in their own right. Each fossil tells a unique story about the animal that left it behind, and the world in which it lived. Some fossils show evidence of ancient ecosystems, like tropical forests, while others reveal the harsh conditions of the world.
