

data needed in the practice of modern psychiatry. Psychodynamic formulations and interviewing skills are not included in this book. In spite of these restrictions, I found the book informative and the authors quite creative. For example, among other things, the book includes a chapter on forensic psychiatry, one on the psychiatric assessment of a child, as well as a chapter devoted to the referral process in psychology. There is also a long list of medical disorders that are commonly associated with psychiatric symptoms. This list has been selected to emphasize those disorders that are most often considered in the psychiatric differential diagnosis. There is also a chapter on brain imaging in psychiatry and the possible indications for these tests. This chapter is well illustrated with computed tomography and magnetic resonance imaging scan pictures in black and white. There is sufficient information about psychopharmacology and specific psychopharmacological agents with their side effect profiles.

This book is intended for those persons already familiar with the clinical practice of psychiatry. As a clinician who specializes in emergency psychiatry, I found the book helpful. Having read several books of this nature, I cannot say that this book is unique in comparison. The material is presented in a concise manner, however, and would be helpful to read if one did not have any other such pocket reference in one's possession. Both authors have brought their individual areas of expertise and experience to bear on the topics discussed. In particular, the chapter on chemical dependence and the psychiatric assessment of a child are informative, extensive, and well written.

From the perspective of an emergency psychiatrist, I found the chapter on management of violent patients in the emergency department practical and useful. It gives tips as to how to calm the patient, the procedure for instituting a Temporary Hold Order, and some guidelines for seclusion and restraint. It specifically recommends that the Order must describe the type of restraint to be used, the duration of use, and the reason for restraint. The authors also emphasize the need for patients in physical restraints to be regularly checked for adequate circulation and comfort and that video monitoring may be useful. These guidelines are very helpful, and for someone interested in doing quality assurance in this area, these variables may be worth monitoring for continuous quality improvement. With regard to the chapter on assessing suicide risk, there are example statements that can help the physician to develop rapport with the patient. There are also warning signs of impending suicide with regard to verbal and behavioural clues.

In the chapter on forensic psychiatry, there is a paragraph on "duty to warn," which refers to the situations in which the physician is obliged to warn third parties who may be endangered by the actions of a patient. Failure to intervene, in the opinion of the authors, constitutes negligence if a patient is judged to pose a serious threat to an identified person. It is recognized that warning a third party may threaten the therapeutic alliance, compromise confidentiality, and unduly frighten the person warned. The physician is advised by the authors to assess carefully the potential for violence and likelihood of a threat, consider any means by which the potential may be reduced (disposal of weapons or hospitalization, for example), and enlist the patient's cooperation or consent in the disclosure of risk to a third party (if possible). In warning a third party, the authors advise physicians to limit the disclosure of information to that required for clarity, notify law enforcement, and document the risk-benefit judgement through the actions taken. We in Canada are not quite clear as to our obligations in regard to our duties to warn and protect. In June of 1996 an expert panel established by the Institute for Clinical Evaluative Sciences presented a report and recommendations to the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario. This report pertains to questions relating to the duty of physicians in circumstances where a patient makes reasonably cogent threats to cause death or serious bodily harm to another individual. I see this as a move in the right direction. We ensure safety now by invoking Form 1 of the Mental Health Act. One should call the Medical Protective Association in individual cases for guidance.

This book, though clear, is not concise. The print is rather small: a larger print is preferable for a book that is supposed to be a pocket reference. One definitely needs to wear one's reading glasses in order to be able to read the print. The size of the book is indeed no more than 15 cm x 10 cm and is quite convenient to carry in a pocket. It is priced at $30.75, and I wondered if it would be more appealing if it were priced around $20.00. All in all, it is a reasonably informative book that fulfils the purpose for which it was written and for whom it was targeted.

Review by

George Voineskos, MD
Toronto, Ontario

The second edition of this book, which is aimed at medical students, psychiatry residents, and individuals of related health professions, is revised to incorporate DSM-IV criteria and advancements in psychiatry developed since the first edition. That a second edition was published within 4 years of the first is an index of the success of the first edition.

The book consists of 26 chapters organized into 4 sections. The first section consists of 5 chapters devoted to the history of psychiatry, diagnosis and classification, interviewing and
