1.1. Summary

The purpose of this laboratory investigation was to determine the effect of the concentration of a solution on the rate of a chemical reaction. In this experiment, the reaction between sodium thiosulfate and hydrochloric acid was used. The rate of the reaction was measured by the time taken for a precipitate to form. The results showed that the rate of the reaction increased as the concentration of the sodium thiosulfate solution increased. This was expected as the rate of the reaction is directly proportional to the concentration of the reactants. The experiment was carried out at room temperature and the results were consistent with the theory. It was concluded that the concentration of the sodium thiosulfate solution has a direct effect on the rate of the reaction. The experiment was carried out at room temperature and the results were consistent with the theory.
