Chapter 1/16

Chapter 1: What is Psychology?

Part 2/2

Module 1.2 Psychology then and now

Edward Titchener and Structuralism

One of Wundt's students, Edward Titchener, came to the United States in 1892 as a psychology professor at Cornell University.

Like Wundt, Titchener believed that the main question of psychology was the nature of mental experiences.

Titchener (1910) typically presented a stimulus and asked his subject to analyze it into its separate features. For example: To look at a lemon and describe its yellowness, brightness, shape, and other characteristics, hence he called his approach structuralism.

Structuralism = It is an attempt to describe the structures that compose the mind, particularly sensations, feelings, and images.

For example: Imagine you are the psychologist: I look at a lemon and try to describe my experience of its brightness to you separately from my experience of its yellowness.

After Titchener died in 1927, psychologists virtually abandoned both his questions and his methods.

Question: Why?

Answer: Remember that a good scientific question is both interesting and answerable. Regardless of whether Titchener's questions about the elements of the mind were interesting, they seemed unanswerable.

William James and Functionalism

In the same era as Wundt and Titchener, Harvard University's William James articulated some of the major issues of psychology and earned recognition as the founder of American psychology.

James's book The Principles of Psychology (1890) defined many of the questions that still dominate psychology today.

James focused on what the mind does rather than what it is and instead of trying to isolate the elements of consciousness, he preferred to learn how people produce useful behaviors.

We call his approach functionalism. He suggested the following examples of good psychological questions (James, 1890):

- How can people strengthen good habits?
- Can someone attend to more than one item at a time?
