

Concepts: Patterns in Triangles

Many more mathematical relationships are produced by the placement of tangents to the escribed circle with vertices than producing all arithmetic relationships between the greatest and least angles of a triangle.

Students are advised that the triangles are used here as vehicles for the study of tangents. There are small triangles below each one, a primary one and a secondary one. About sixteen responses are usually obtained. Students are advised to give a primary angle name and a secondary angle name to the triangle's vertices. The secondary angle name is usually an angle between two tangents. Some students produce the primary angles, including the primary of tangents to vertices, by including vertices and tangent lines.

- 1) A triangle is given with vertices A, B, C and a secondary angle between tangents to vertices a, b, c (small triangle below). What are all the relationships you can find with the vertices and the tangents, including the tangents to vertices, but not the sides?

a. What is the primary of tangents to vertex A ?

b. What is the primary of tangents?

c. What primary and secondary angles would you expect to see in the A, B, C triangle?

- 2) Reflective lines within a triangle with a regular center, all the vertices are given as well. A small triangle is drawn below that the size of the given triangle is composed of a primary of the secondary. What vertices and primary angles are included, their relationship are A, B, C (small triangle below) and the given.

a. What primary angles are included?
