Hydrocarbon Nomenclature and Representations

Synopsis

Students are required to study chemical structures and nomenclature of hydrocarbons before a final exam part of organic chemistry. This exam poses the challenge with various ways of representing chemical structures of the same molecule and identification of each molecule.

Organizational objectives

Students will start off by identifying each molecule without having to name anything and then they will name all the hydrocarbons without organic substituents. They will finally look at molecules having some substituents and recognize the nomenclature. Finally, they will be asked to name each one.

Initial structures with names and/or identification

In this part, you are given either the name or the structure of a molecule and need to do an exact answer. Right by looking you can find the name getting a better feeling for how the molecules are named. For that purpose, that also brought into the challenge of figuring out the appropriate name. It is to give the students a head start by automatically recognizing the given molecules.

An unnamed molecule type for exact identification

In this challenge phase, you'll be required to recognize type of the representation of molecules. There are several other types of these representations, though, also called formulae, nomenclature is necessary to our extent that you should be able to name them (especially with small atoms) either you need to select the structure and nomenclature of the molecule (just off-hand).
