

FACTORS THAT AFFECT CLIMATE

Ocean Currents

Ocean currents are like giant rivers in the ocean that constantly flow in specific directions. These currents are like nature's way of moving warm or cold water around the globe. They play a big role in controlling the Earth's climate by redistributing heat. For example, the Gulf Stream, a powerful warm ocean current, flows from the Gulf of Mexico up the East Coast of the United States and across the Atlantic Ocean. It brings warm water, making the climate milder in places like the United Kingdom and northern Europe, which would otherwise be much colder. So, ocean currents act like climate regulators, making our world a bit more predictable and affecting the weather we experience!

Altitude

Altitude refers to how high or low a place is above sea level. Imagine standing on a tall mountain versus being at the beach - that's altitude! Altitude affects climate because the higher you go, the cooler it gets. This is because the air is thinner at higher altitudes, and thinner air can't hold as much heat. For example, mountains like the Rocky Mountains in the United States have colder climates at the top because of their high altitude. If you've ever gone hiking and felt the temperature drop as you climbed a mountain, that's the effect of altitude on climate!

Latitude

Latitude is like the horizontal lines on a globe that tell us how far a place is from the equator. The equator is an imaginary line that divides the Earth into the Northern and Southern Hemispheres. How close or far a place is from the equator affects its climate because it determines how much direct sunlight it gets. Places near the equator get a lot of direct sunlight, making them hotter, while places further away get less direct sunlight, making them cooler. For example, countries near the equator like Brazil and Kenya usually have warmer climates with more tropical rainforests, while places like Canada and Russia, which are further from the equator, tend to be cooler, especially during winter. So, latitude is like a climate clue that helps us predict what the weather might be like in different parts of the world!
